

No, independent financial planners may not hold power of attorney over the accounts of their clients, except over those of family members composing their household and over those of commercial companies they effectively run.

They may however have a right of access to the account.

Source URL: <https://www.fsma.be/en/faq/42-may-independent-financial-planner-hold-power-attorney-over-accounts-its-clients>